career had never been interrupted by slave labor? Nonsense! Some place, somewhere, Ruthie had picked up a pompous slogan, something to cling to mentally. "Willpower is man's most dynamic force," and if that was true and Ruthie didn't doubt it, then she must win in the end. Besides the kind young doctor at the glittering, new hospital had told her, her leg was almost as good as new.

Ruthie sat down on her bed and massaged with deft fingers the upper part of her left calf. She had worked out a routine or rather invented a new dance, something quite original which nobody had ever performed yet. Her creation was unrelated to the classical ballet and yet ideally suited to express deep emotions without unduly exercising her bad leg. "Turn your disadvantages to your advantages," she had read somewhere. Yawning, she slipped into bed and before turning out the light she leafed through her mother's yellowed scrapbook.

"Mrs. Elena Rosenov danced the Rubenstein waltz, it so to say, constituted her 'piece de resistance.' As an older generation of balletomanes see things one was left feeling that one should first tune in to a new wave length and then only then watch it all over again to be able to give any coherent impression of it at all. Mrs. Rosenov in pale green tunic, reminiscent of the Bacchante of Pavlova. The speed was stratospheric. The choreographic ingredients introduced such daring degree of acrobatic into classic than any sensations left over during several minutes of hypnosis by sheer vitality and speed were divided between admiration for accomplishments and breath-taking thrills. What an aesthetic feat? Ruthie blew her nose. Would people ever talk about her in such glowing terms? With difficulty she read on: "The delighted audience went home feeling ten years younger which after all is the chief aim of first class entertainment. The woman around her. On a table in her room was the inevitable pink satin slipper with the inevitable darned needle stuck through her toe. Mrs. Rosenov is courteous itself even to a very charming serious-faced person with a cloud of blond hair and an occasional quiet, most of the time smile. She wore an elegant becoming, strawberry-colored dress and was looking very young. Ruthie was added to a treasured collection of photographs. Ruthie closed the scrapbook. Stratospheric speed? How could she ever achieve stratospheric speed with her leg shot at in a concentration camp? "Don't forget your ballet lessons," the picture smiled eerily. She had not forgotten them, she had lived up to an impossible request. She signed deeply, said her Schema (Israel) and fell asleep.

"Have some more oatmeal," Mrs. Sally Bleiberg frowned at her foster mother across the breakfast table. "No, thank you, Tante Sally," Ruthie shook her head. Mrs. Bleiberg's rown deepened. "A good breakfast gives you a good start." "I can't eat so much in the morning." "You look pretty in that new suit, every inch a young lady," Mrs. Bleiberg's ample features softened as she glanced over Ruthie's pleasing appearance. "Raring to go, eh? Don't you want me to come and watch you, I'll give you a big hand?" "No, please," Ruthie shook her head. "It'll make me more nervous ..."

"As you like, Mrs. Bleiberg shrugged. "All the Mazel in the world to you, but take it easy, you know what I mean." Mrs. Bleiberg stacked the breakfast dishes in the sink. "You did your best," Ruthie's foster mother began to wash the dishes. "If they don't take you on, it's not your fault. There's a lot of other things." A slight tension sprang up in the cosy, old-fashioned kitchen.
