participated in municipal and parliamentary elections. Between 1927 and 1937 it virtually ran Polish Jewry. Economically, too, the Aguda wielded tremendous power. In 1936 it controlled 115 co-operatives with a membership of 15,825. Rabbi Meir Schapira, a notable Aguda leader, instituted the Daf Yomi (the daily study of a page of the Talmud) and erected a magnificent yeshiva at Lublin, one of the finest buildings in pre-war Poland. It is not, then, surprising that Poland was represented by 242 delegates at the Kenessiya (Aguda World Conference) in 1923, for the creation of an observant Orthodox Jewish community in Poland was the great achievement of the Aguda. But its ambitions were more far-reaching. Its over-all objective was "to revive the traditional concept of Klal Yisrael," to unite the scattered and splintered Jewish people. It did not succeed in fulfilling this missionary aim, even though members of the movement included the greatest scholars and rabbis of the day: Rabbi Israel Meir Kagan (the Chofetz Chaim) of Radin, Chaim Ozer Grodinsky of Vilna and the great chassidic rabbi of Poland. In vain Rabbi Ferber of London, pleaded for an understanding with other segments of Jewry, but by virtue of the uncompromising principles that were its raison d'être such an understanding was impossible. Article Four of the Aguda constitution specifically lays down that "members of organizations whose principles are in contradiction to that of the Aguda are not eligible for (membership in) the Central organs." This excluded the Mizrahi and practically every other party.

Yet, in a curious manner, the Aguda did play party politics. The Agudist Isaac Breuer believed that "political Zionism seeks to exchange the Galut of Israel for the Galut of the nations" and this belief coloured the Aguda attitude. It collaborated with the assimilationists rather than with the Mizrachists. It rarely cooperated with the Club of Jewish Deputies in Poland and never with the Jewish Agency. It supported the Polish pro-Pilsudski Government, and its parliamentary representatives were thereby forced to accept the discipline of a Government whose avowed object was the economic strangulation of the Jews. The Aguda even considered working with the Revisionists in the hope of undermining the strength of the Zionists. "Whether Jabotinsky is a good Jew or not," reasoned Rosenheim, "is a matter of secondary importance. In case of necessity it is important to make a pact with any man in order to break the
