

Man of Vision and Reality

impressive by their power of expression. Swift of movement, he was wont to mount stairs at dazzling speed. He used to deliver public speeches with great temperance. His presence in society was dominant and he was gifted with a charisma that carried his people after him. His writings run into scores of volumes, in addition to the scores of thousands of letters that he wrote. He delivered thousands of speeches in many countries and traversed millions of kilometers.

Giant Among Statesmen
Ben Gurion had the rare ability of always being in the right place, of saying the required word and of carrying out what he said. He knew the world and never dreaded attacking it sometimes. He knew his people and was not afraid of standing at its head. In a world that renewed its social redemption, he fought for the political identification of the Jewish people, and to the people that had learned to adapt itself to the Diaspora and dependence, he offered a homeland and independence.

He belonged to that rare group of giant statesmen — such as Churchill, De Gaulle, Adenauer and Mao. They were all outstanding in their traits and of immutable character; they all were possessed of a reverberating and heroic style in speech and in action. Almost all of them began their path by rebelling against convention. Capable of making decisions, they were all patriots and in the end they became a legend.

He had hoped for peace with the Arabs. Although fully alert to reality, he had hoped to change it. He was keenly aware of all three dimensions of time. From the past he derived his faith, from the present his realism and from the future his hope. As for himself, he remained satisfied with little and continued to demand much of himself. His vision reached lofty heights but his deeds burrowed deep in the ground. He died full of years of deeds, but not full of satisfaction.

Few are the people to whom one can ascribe so many struggles, so many achievements, so many victories, so many revivals and so many decisions. It is much more difficult, however, to find a parallel to the man who, even at the very height of achievement for his people, was able to tanzilize their hearts by his vision and stringent demands.

The Jew, the Zionist, the Man

The Man
But even greater than Weizmann the Jew, and Weizmann the Zionist, was Chaim Weizmann the man. All who were granted the privilege of working with him and being in his proximity, were deeply aware of his human greatness.

What lends greatness to a man is not his deeds or achievements, but what he is and what he represents. Chaim Weizmann was, in essence, an artist, even in his science, and most definitely in his political work. Greater than his intellect was his intuition. Scientists have told us that his greatest work was achieved not by logical deduction, but by intuition. This was also true of his political feats. He was an artist, dominated by moods and highly sensitive to atmosphere. He needed friends, warmth, sympathy. He was tremendously temperamental, he could hate and love, rage and forgive. He was never calculating, sly or scheming. He was spontaneous, and sometimes said and did things than ran counter to all political calculations and brought him trouble. He exposed himself to attacks, was incautious in his utterances and had nothing but supreme contempt for the scheming of the run-of-the-mill politicians. His was the self-assurance of genius. He refused to do things that were incompatible with his nature. He was, like all artists, an aristocrat — claiming the right to use his own methods and refusing to be forced into the strait-jacket of party politics or become involved in party programs.

The deepest meaning of a great personality lies in its symbolic
