Faisal Hussein, top Jerusalem official for the Palestinian Authority, dies at 61

By NAOMI SEGAL JERUSALEM (JTA) - The top Palestinian official in charge of Jerusalem affairs died last week of a heart attack while on a visit to Kuwait.

Many Israelis considered Faisal Hussein, 61, a relative moderate in Palestinian politics. Yossi Beilin, a former negotiator with the Palestinians and a leading Israeli dove, said May 31 that Israel had lost a negotiating partner. "He was a tough negotiator. He was a nationalist," Beilin said. "But being a nationalist did not mean, in his view, that the preference was to hate Israelis. 'I remember talking to him at length about a Palestinian-Jordanian confederation, and he would say to me, 'Why not a Palestinian-Israeli confederation?'"

Israel's left-wing Meretz Party issued a statement of condolences, saying the Palestinian people had lost one of its great sons, who represented his people with honor, courage and responsibility. However, many of Hussein's comments worried Israelis, who felt that his moderate image was highly relative.

Hussein freely told journalists that while the Palestinians were demanding a state only on land Israel had conquered in the 1967 Six Day War, such an arrangement would not necessarily bind coming generations of Palestinians. In March, he told a Beirut audience that the Palestinian goal remained an Arab state in the entire territory between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River, and that his frequent contacts with Israeli officials were a necessary evil designed to put an end to relations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Reports said Hussein died May 31 in his hotel room before attending an Arab conference against normalization of ties with Israel. According to Reuters, a call Hussein made for improved Palestinian ties with Kuwait - which severed relations with the Palestinian leadership after Yasser Arafat supported Iraq during the Persian Gulf war - set off an uproar in Kuwait's Parliament on May 30. Several Kuwaiti lawmakers reportedly said May 30 that Arafat is still unwelcome in the Gulf state.

Hussein's body was to be flown from Kuwait to Amman in a helicopter belonging to Jordan's King Abdullah. From there, it was to be transferred to the West Bank city of Ramallah. Hussein was to be buried in Jerusalem on June 1, next to his father's grave in a cemetery near the Temple Mount.

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, in Brussels at the time of Hussein's death, said the Palestinian people had lost one of its great figures. Arafat described Hussein as a friend who was by his side through every phase of life - though the two clashed repeatedly over Hussein's attempts to build his own base of political support within Palestinian society. A Palestinian Authority statement called Hussein a martyr, promising him "and all other Palestinian martyrs to continue their path until we regain our right to a Palestinian state and Jerusalem as its capital." Black flags were hung at Orient House, the de facto Palestinian headquarters in eastern Jerusalem, which Hussein headed.
