like to know? She's smart enough to get into trouble, that's all. Smart enough for that and not smart enough to get out of it. If sausage isn't good enough for you, I'll eat it. Stup your gamin', boy, an' give me the sausage!"

"I'll have to put my basket down to get it for you," I said, wondering what was the matter with the woman and her daughter. That made them act so queer.

Elspeth came up to me and poked a fat finger at my face. "Nieth, nieth," she whispered and then ran away, giggling to herself.

"Elspeth, wash your face. You're going to be married today. Marie, throw that gutter-snipe out. Do you hear? No, wait a minute. What did you say your name was, boy?"

"Herbie," Elspeth said. "I'll not have it!" She pulled a soiled handkerchief out of her pocket and blew her nose violently. "Elspeth, set this a nice young man! Tell her your name, Herbie. How old are you?"

"I'm 13. My name is Herbie," I said, turning to Elspeth reluctantly. "Are you sure you're not older? You're big for your age. He's older, he's lying. He's much older. I knew Herbie. He was thin..."

"You're nieth. He's nieth, isn't he, mamma? Nieth! Nieth!" Elspeth dug a pudgy finger into my cheek, gurgling.

"Nice? No, he's not nice. He's just a little boy. He smells bad. Awh! Smells of garlic. You gutter-snipe, you! You filthy hoodlum! How dare you come to my house? Have you ever been here before? Did you ever see Elspeth?" Her voice lowered, mysteriously. "Did you ever see Elspeth, did you, when she ran out of the house, late at night? Did you ever meet her, did you, in the park, and do you know what did you, boy? Did you?" Her voice suddenly became haughty again. "Garlic smell! You reek of it. You beggar!"

"If you please," I said, turning to Marie. "I'd like my money so I can leave."

"We won't pay you. You get out of here. And take that smell with you! I won't have it in my house. Here we have only the best, silk and lace and satin. Look around you, look around you. Do you think garlic belongs here, here in my... adorable, yes, adorable house?"

Marie fumbled for her purse.

"Get out of here, you street rat, you smelly animal!"

"My money! It's for Mr. Katzoff. I've got to have it."

"Money? Katzoff? Jew! Jew! Jew smell! Garlic smell! I'll not have such a person in my house. You'll not marry Elspeth. Not a smelly Jew! Elspeth, wash your face. Wash it, do you hear? Get out of here!"

The woman confronted me, her face quivering, her hand pointing the way.

"I've got to have my money," I said stubbornly. "I've got to have 75 cents."

"You'll not have it, you garlic Jew! You smell! Not a penny, Marie, put him out and close the door."

"Then I'll take my sausage back," I said, and reached for it. The woman suddenly slapped my face, hard.

"That's ours. Ours! We're poor, do you understand? We have nothing. Starving! Me of fine blood and riches. Look at that!" She raised a pale, fleshless arm. "We have to eat stench! Get out of here. You smell!"

Before I knew exactly how it happened, I found myself on the outside, the door firmly shut behind me. I pounded on it, furiously. "I want the 75 cents," I yelled. "Do you hear? I've got to have it."

There was no answer from within and then from the window upstairs and then from the window on the glass. Looking up, I saw the vacant, blotchy face of Elspeth waving at me with her strange, crazy stare and giggling to herself.

"What's the matter, what's the matter, Herbie?" Mr. Katzoff asked me when I caught up with him. I was panting hard, for I had run all the way. "They wouldn't pay me. They kept the sausage and wouldn't pay me. The woman called me a smelly, gutter-snipe Jew and she was crazy, so was her daughter. But they threw me out and they wouldn't pay me. She even hit me!"

"Well, well, well," said Mr. Katzoff, amazed. "They did that to you! They said you were a smelly Jew, eh? She hit you?"

"She said I smelled of dirty old garlic and she was nuts, Mr. Katzoff, just plain nuts!"

"To call you such names, and the garlic smell so beautiful! So very nice! It's a shame," Mr. Katzoff said. "It's a shame. And she didn't pay you, huh?"

"No, Mr. Katzoff. I'm sorry. I tried to make her pay. I tried real hard."

"Herbie, never mind. Profit and loss, who cares? We're all goin' to the same place, anyhow. Ain't we, Herbie? All goin' to the same place. Herbie, you hungry? Me, I'm
