My Father's Broad Shoulders

By ALBERT HALPER

The summer started early in Chicago that year. One sultry afternoon toward the end of June, when I was helping my father in his little West Side grocery, my mother looked out at the hot sky and cried, "If I don't go to the country soon, I'll roast to death with the little ones!" She had come down from our flat over the store to get some things she needed for our supper, and was careful to make her announcement just after some customers had left the store carrying good-sized orders. My father stared out the window at the steaming pavement.

"In the paper this morning," my mother continued, "I read where the temperature will hit ninety before evening, and no relief in sight."

My father grunted. He let his glance wander over the shelves of canned goods and the sacks of Grade 2 potatoes and come to rest on a bunch of overripe bananas. "All right," he said finally. "I'm as rich as Rockefeller. I'm wallowing in millions. Where do you want to spend the summer? In Southampton or Newport?"

My mother reddened, picked up the groceries she had come in for, and went out of the store.

"Dave," my father said, scowling at me, "this world is not run by statesmen."

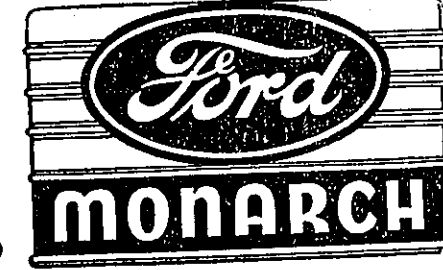

"No, sir," I said. "It's not run by diplomats."

"No, sir."

"It's run by women. You're only nine years old, so you don't understand that yet. At your age, I didn't understand either." He stared out the window moodily, then turned to me. "All right, go ahead and take an apple from the barrel. It'll get rotten anyway."

That night, it was still very hot. In our flat over the grocery, the whole family — my father and mother, my thirteen-year-old sister, my four brothers, and myself — sat near the open windows in the front room waiting for a breeze. My oldest
