frustrated when this does not happen. There are those who expect immediate and full recognition from the country for their sacrifice in giving up a safe existence to come to Israel; they, too, are disappointed if this recognition fails to come. Those who are by way of being dreamers imagine Israel as a country based on a model society, with no transgressors and no social injustice; they are a little shocked when they find it a country pretty much like others.

"Giving and Receiving" Everyone of these individuals, wherever he comes from and whatever his motives for coming, has to undergo a phase of adaptation. It is his fundamental attitude towards the country and his realization of its difficulties and needs, even before he actually arrives in Israel, that will determine the extent to which he is capable of this adaptation. It is a matter of "giving and receiving" — what is he ready to give to this country, which is still in the stage of building and requires a hand from everyone who is ready to lend one; and what, on the other hand, is he looking forward to receiving in return? Finding a compromise between this

"give and take" is the main problem of some of the Hostel people. Apart from being a threshold into the life of the country, the Hostel offers another kind of experience to its lodgers. For the first time in their life, many of them meet people with a background entirely different from their own: Americans, South Africans, Australians, Europeans, Indians; religious and non-religious. A few speak Hebrew or make an attempt at it, but the common language, in general, is English (so much so that it is a current joke to ask somebody staying in the Hostel whether he has already improved his English).

Like life in the country, so life in the Hostel requires a period of adaptation. You have to share a flat with four other people, each of whom has different ways and habits. One room, for instance, may be occupied by a young couple. They get up at six in the morning — he, for his work, and she, to potter around the kitchenette and do her cooking, to the great chagrin of her neighbours. The second room may belong to two girls who go to an Ulpan in the morning and who have a habit of holding parties in their room until late at night. In the small single room there may live some orthodox person, who is all too sensitive to his
