"I'll sponsor you."

So for six weeks I played there, that was the probation period. The secretary said, "You'll see if you like us, and we'll see if we like you." He was retired from the Civil Service. He said, "Quite frankly, Mr. Richards, I can usually tell by looking at a person. What profession are you in?"

I said, "I'm in the furniture business."

Willy told me, "He's a momser. They all are."

Still, I enjoyed playing there, it was a nice course. I usually played in a foursome with Willy and a couple of friends of his; now and again I'd join up with some of the other members. They were all right, quite friendly, though I didn't go for all that boozing in the bar afterwards. Willy said, "Listen, they're like that, you won't change them. That's the way they live."

But I was hitting the ball well, I was improving. If they let me play there, they could drink as much as they liked. After six weeks, I went to see the secretary. I said, "Well I've decided. I'd like to join."

He said, "I see." There was something changed about him. He was one of those lean men with a very clipped way of speaking and a little moustache, the kind of person that never seems to open up. He said, "You've been playing mostly with Mr. Rose, haven't you?"

HEADINGLY

I said, "That's right. Mr. Rose was sponsoring me."

He said, "Mr. Richards, are you a Jew?"

I said, "Yes, I am, as a matter of fact, but what's that got to do with playing golf?"

He said, "I'm afraid we have a Jewish quota."

I said, "What does that mean?"

He said, "It means we can't admit you."

I said, "I see."

To tell the truth, I couldn't believe it was happening. I'd got this numb feeling, all dazed, as though I was dreaming it. I said, "Well, can't you put me on the waiting list?"

I could hear myself speak; it didn't sound like my voice.

He said, "There really wouldn't be much point."

I said, "Why not?"

He said, "The list is so long."

I said, "Well, there's nothing more to discuss, then, is there?"

I stood up, I didn't shake hands with him, then when I got to the door he asked me, "Mr. Richards,
