

IN BATTLE AGAINST HUNGER

testing under American conditions and with American parasites. "Each country has its own spectrum of rust types," points out Prof. Wahl. Material that is susceptible in Israel may be resistant to the diseases prevalent in the Philippines or Korea. Since parasite diseases are "prohibited imports" in all countries, the material is sent to international plant testing laboratories throughout the world — in Kenya, Ecuador, South Africa, Egypt, India, Turkey, Sweden, Canada, Portugal, etc. The work is protracted. The growth of plants cannot be accelerated; each stage of the experiment must pass through the natural cycle of germination, maturity and death.

A drought year can cause a twelve-month delay by ruining an entire series of field tests. Definite results may be achieved only after some five or ten years.

So too short a time has elapsed to be able to speak of the results of the work at the Faculty, which began only two years ago. But in the file containing correspondence received from the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the sponsors of the project, there is a sheaf of reports on the project. One of them, received some months ago, reads: "... new sources of resistance to these diseases (have been) revealed ... the individuals should be complimented on their progress to date"; another declares: "the report received (from Israel) indicates that excellent progress is being made on the project."

But even should the experiments yield maximum results, there is a further point to be considered: material that has proven its worth in the greenhouse, been tested in Rehovot and throughout Israel, passed the exacting tests of the U.S. Department of Agriculture and stood up to the onslaughts of exotic parasites, will nevertheless be valueless from the point of view of food production, for wild varieties of the grain crops produce only small yields. Here the plant geneticists and breeders come into the picture. While preserving the disease-resistant genetic make-up of the wild plant, they are crossbreeding it with the aristocratic commercial varieties that produce high yields. When this task is completed, the last link in the chain will have been forged; a grain that will help still the cries of the that will safely ripen in regions hungry will have been presented to previously ravaged by disease and the world.

THE PLAY'S THE THING

these very things — rivalry among children, or disciplinary problems — exist in their own homes. Or perhaps through the dramas, they can prevent such heartache by dealing properly with potential danger spots. "We rarely experience any dramatic revelations from our audiences. But sometimes, as in one particular case, I remember we helped a troubled woman feel that she was not a failure," one of the actors remarked.

She said that the discussion was about showing love, and one woman obviously quite troubled said that her daughter was not in the least affectionate. The child seemed rather to recoil from any outward demonstration of affection from her parents. Various people in the audience asked her questions about the child's behavior and finally pointed out that hers was a reserved undemonstrative child who showed her affection with her willingness to help her mother and father in any way, rather than with hugs or kisses.

This woman had felt a failure as a mother, a failure because her daughter didn't love her. The discussion helped towards a deeper understanding of both her child and herself.

The group's latest project, by request, is to take four sessions of plays to Selkirk, Man., for the Association for Retarded Children and the Canadian Mental Health branches there. The CMHA is the source of the plays and also provides supervision.

The first performance by the branch was given more than ten years ago under the direction of John Hirsch, artistic director of the Manitoba Theatre Centre, who helped the girls establish a pattern. Two of the earliest directors, Mrs. Ben Karasick and Mrs. Arthur Abrams, are still active with the branch. A group which provides a unique learning experience for both
