a concrete water tower.

Seated under an enormous umbrella, he urged his African construction team on to even greater efforts as they operated the cement mixers in the tropical downpour.

I spent the night in one of the rest-houses used by the engineers and foremen working on projects remote from the cities and big towns.

I had asked him whether they got on well with the local population and if they discussed socialism or other questions with them.

There must be something like a thousand Israelis in Nigeria, 300 or so of them living in Ibadan, and earning between $500 and $650 a month, plus allowances for housing and travel.

compared with what they could earn in Israel and enables them to buy all kinds of extras to take back home with them...

But very few indeed stay for more than the two-year term of their contracts, seeming as keen as their wives to get back to the homes they have left behind in Tel Aviv...

All the Israelis in Ibadan live in villas in the European quarter, as they do in the other cities, with two or three Africans per family to do the housework, drive the car and look after the garden...

The Israeli families all belong to the European sports and swimming
